

HISTORY

An outstanding example of modern architecture, Rose Seidler House was built by the celebrated architect Harry Seidler between 1948 and 1950 for his parents Rose and Max Seidler. Bold colours, open planning and spectacular views of Ku-ring-gai National Park make this a unique venue.

THE HOUSE

The outstanding feature of Rose Seidler House is that it is one of the purest examples of mid-20th-century modern domestic architecture in Australia. The living and dining rooms feature mostly original furniture and form one of the most important postwar design collections in Australia. The uncluttered interior, lightweight furniture, modern domestic technology, labour-saving devices and low-maintenance materials are important elements in the modern servantless house. The kitchen was one of Australia's best equipped – the very latest model refrigerator, stove and dishwasher were supplemented by a waste disposal unit, an exhaust fan and a Mixmaster. The house is divided into two distinct zones that are linked by a flexible transitional zone of playroom, stairs and sundeck, which can be used to extend either public or private areas. Rose Seidler House is well suited as a film and photography location or can be offered for guided tours as part of an event in the gardens and grounds.

GARDENS & GROUNDS

The gardens and grounds can be used for wedding ceremonies and receptions, or dinner and cocktail functions for up to 200 people. The garden is made up of unusual rockeries, exotic plants, flowers, fruit trees and vegetable gardens overlooking the natural reserve below. With the strong, modernist lines of the house, this is an arresting site for any event.
